Overtime

By Rachel Hughes

The faux leather chair squeaks mockingly
As ticking hands
Expire promises,
Turning them into echoed apologies.

What happens when working to put food on the table means eating alone at a desk?
What happens when windows in the coveted corner office turn out to all be mirrors?
What happens when weathered hands caress more keys than loved ones' cheeks?

Incandescent bulbs and elevator buttons
Shine brighter than a billion stars.
The sky is obsidian;
Yet the city does not sleep.
