I remember the red lipstick stains of the kiss marks on the mirror of my high school bathroom. Shaped like pistachio shells—ready to be cracked and consumed.

I think of the girl I barely knew—fresh-faced and quiet in my geometry class. The whispers about the baby she conceived in that high school bathroom. Smudged lip marks on the mirror ready to bare their teeth at her as she kissed the chapped lips of the boy who would make her happy this time. A symbol of love left by one of her friends who would ruin her reputation—a friend who had learned her own botched-up form of love from her daddy when he crept in her room in the dark—where no mirrors could reflect the truth.

In the hallway, quiet whispers that she heard and tried to ignore as she stumbled by—clutching her textbooks—belly swelling like a tumor that she wanted to cut out. Now, remembering the rounded shapes of those lipstick marks, I recall the leaves on my little plant cutting in its brown bowl shaped just like the bloodred lipstick stains, curved on each side, coming to two points, with a crease where a mouth can open to speak or scream or kiss.
Green this time—fresh and new, with no smudges. Only two leaves have sprouted from the stem, vulnerable amidst a world that moves to crush them. With each new day, the two leaves stretch towards the light of the sun on my balcony, like that girl whose name I don’t remember and her little baby, who sprang up out of that not-love. The leaves reach out in hopes of a heaven and a love that lasts longer than the lipstick stains that the janitor washed away in the morning.
